The present invention relates to a nonvolatile semiconductor storage device and, more particularly, to a nonvolatile semiconductor storage device having an EEPROM (Electrically Erasable Programmable Read Only Memory) cell structure. A nonvolatile semiconductor memory device, in which a floating gate and a control gate are formed through an insulating film on a channel region formed between source and drain formed on a semiconductor substrate, is called an EEPROM. This nonvolatile semiconductor memory device is a transistor in which charge storage in a floating gate modifies threshold voltage of the transistor, and is used as a memory element to store information. For example, in a NAND cell type EEPROM, a floating gate and a control gate are formed on an element separation insulating film. These are connected in series with a select gate formed between the control gate and a channel region. The select gate is formed from a second polysilicon layer which overlaps the element separation insulating film. Nonvolatile semiconductor memory devices having this structure are disclosed, for example, in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,378,962, 5,917,764, 5,981,300, 6,307,196 and the like. In U.S. Pat. No. 5,917,764, the invention of a "nonvolatile memory device including a nonvolatile memory cell comprising a substrate, a first drain region, a first source region, a floating gate, a control gate, a second drain region and a second source region is described. The second source region is located closer to the first drain region than the first source region, and is not electrically connected to the first drain region and the first source region."
