Not only has the RCMP been told to knock off their uniform, officers are no longer being given shotguns or nightsticks, but the police vehicles are barely recognizable as cruisers. And on the road, a man in a black jacket is no longer the "cops" to motorists. Since the police have been told to forgo the uniforms, they're going to have to forgo the specialized police training. "We have lost half our training cadre, and we're still around," said Sergeant Rob Donnelly, a training sergeant. "We don't have a model that looks like the police we're going to have to train. And there's no time to make that up." New recruits will undergo basic training, but it's expected to take between three and six months. "You're going to have to teach the new cadre how to do all the things we've done for the past 25 years," said Donnelly. "You're going to have to teach the new cadre how to do all the things we've done for the past 25 years." Each new recruit will have 30 days to master the rules of the road. If
