Renal tubular epithelial cells express the transmembrane transporters involved in the transport of xenobiotics from blood to urine. This review focuses on a comparison of the alterations in the expression of these transporters in the experimental models of mercury toxicity and in cases of human exposure to mercury. Glutathione-dependent transporters exhibit a wide range of variations in their regulation in response to mercury. However, the overall effect of mercury on the activity and expression of these transporters in human and experimental models suggests that the cells of the proximal tubule are particularly vulnerable to mercury toxicity.A big click, clack and chiming went off as an old mechanical pipe organ, which rests against the walls of the nave of St Peter's cathedral at the Vatican, began playing. The scene has become a regular occurrence with Pope Francis's long-awaited arrival in Rome, a symbol of the first time a pontiff will directly address a e79caf774b
