Invention This invention relates to a method for packing fragments, especially the DNA fragments, which are obtained by digestion of the genome of a cell into smaller fragments. 2. Description of the Related Art There is a large demand for standardized methods for packing DNA fragments which are obtained from the genome of a cell. This is of particular interest for DNA cloning methods. For example, for the DNA cloning processes which are presently being used, at the earliest step in the procedure, the DNA fragments are obtained by destruction of the target genome. This fragmentation is usually carried out with restriction enzymes. The restriction enzyme digestion enzymes leave specific sites in the molecules and the resolution of these sites is used to select the fragments.
However, this does not permit rational design of the packing process. In many cases, the fragment selection is a random process. Also, it is necessary to separate the DNA fragments which are obtained by digestion from the enzyme used for the fragmentation. In addition, the DNA fragments are usually broken up by cooling in the presence of high salt concentrations. On the other hand, a number of the DNA fragments which are obtained can be used with considerable advantage for the amplification of the genome of the cell to be used for the cloning, while other fragments are advantageous for the cloning of a different genome. For example, a number of the partial fragments of a genome, which are produced by restriction fragments, and fragments of the genome which contain a chromosome end can only be used in a single cloning step. Due to the different requirements for the fragments, it is not possible with the present methods to keep the fragments separated during the packing process. The packing of the DNA fragments that are obtained depends primarily on the design of the packing apparatus, and secondarily on the design of the packing method. The present state of the art is unsatisfactory for systematic procedures for the packing of the DNA fragments which are obtained by the fragmentation of the target genome.Q: integrate
